Dr. Stephanie Child is an expert in survey research and methodology, statistical sampling, and data analysis. She has applied this expertise across a wide range of consulting projects and litigation cases.

In her survey research, Dr. Child has worked on matters involving intellectual property disputes, with specific expertise in survey development and analyses related to trademarks, patents, and false advertising. This includes surveys to establish likelihood of confusion, secondary meaning, genericness, and dilution.

Dr. Child has also worked on class action and antitrust matters. Across her survey work, she is experienced in collecting data via internet and cohort panels, through respondent-driven (or snowball) sampling, and via in-person intercept studies of both general and hard-to-reach populations. Her expertise also extends to evaluating and critiquing surveys and other market research, including qualitative research such as focus groups.

Prior to joining NERA, Dr. Child was an Assistant Professor at Harvard in the School of Public Health, where her research focused on longitudinal, causal inference analyses and surveying behavioral data. Her research was funded by the National Institutes of Health and has been published in dozens of peer-reviewed journals.
